

Fractional Chief Information Officer

In today's environment, growing organizations need a senior technology leader who understands the business objectives, stays current with industry trends, threats, and the technology environment, and provides technical direction to support the company. Finding the right person for this leadership role can be a challenging, expensive, and lengthy process. And growing companies may find they need the leadership and technical capabilities at the C-level long before they can afford the salary. The answer lies in a leadership-as-a-service approach: the fractional CIO.

The ROI of a fractional technology leader

A fractional CIO is an experienced, multi-faceted senior technology executive who serves as a part-time or as-needed chief information officer for organizations. The position leverages the knowledge, perspective, and expertise of a senior executive without the time, commitment, or high cost of a full-time hire. Working with your leadership team, your DTS CIO helps determine and implement a broad technology agenda, helping your organization benefit from leading-edge technologies.

Fractional role. Total focus.

A fractional CIO provides the same expertise and capability as a full-time CIO without the associated level of salary, benefits, and overhead expense associated with adding a senior executive. At DTS, our fractional CIOs typically serve several companies, managing day-to-day IT operations, resources, and staff as well as the alignment between the business and technology.

- » IT and business alignment
- » IT leadership and management
- » Current technology landscape
- » Key performance metrics definition
